> Many years before his decease, the celebrated Chant rey attended a funeral at St. Marlin's-in-the-Fields.-The graveyard was strewn with human bones and the grave digger was adding irreverently to the heaps .-Chantrey inquired what eventually became of the remains. The sexton replied with a smile, that when they became too plentiful, "they were carted off in loads to the Thames." A friend describes the effect of this antreme. His cheeks grew sickly white, and perspiration poured down them. At the moment he looked himself like a corpse newly risen from the grave before him. "I will take care," he said, with a shudder, "that they do not cart my bones to the Thames. They shall be undisturbed under my native sod." And, accordingly, they are five pounds per annum for ten poor boys of the village of Norton, so long as they remember industriously to pluck the weeds and to remove the nettles that deface the gravestone of Francis Chantrey.
